

Curbed Los Angeles, July 16, 2018 “38 remarkable places to encounter public art in Los Angeles From Santa Monica to the Valley,” by Blanca Barragan
<https://la.curbed.com/maps/los-angeles-best-public-art>

PLAY WEEK

All things urban recreation, from reinventing the sidewalk to innovations in children's playground design.

Summer's longer days mean more time to poke around the city and explore new neighborhoods.

With that in mind, here's our map of notable public art in L.A., highlighting some of the coolest murals, sculptures, and installations around town. We've included newer pieces—a mural on Skid Row created by residents of the neighborhood—as well as time-tested favorites like "Urban Light" at LACMA.

Good public art doesn't just live in Central L.A., as a row of murals on a Pacoima street or a giant fork stuck in a Pasadena road show.

An urban-scale rainbow, an interactive hologram, and a space-age sculpture on the brink of restoration—all those and more are featured on this 38-point guide to finding public art wherever you go in Los Angeles.

10. "Los Angeles Opens Its Heart of Compassion" by Cliff Garten

3150 Wilshire Blvd
 Los Angeles, CA 90010

Visit Website

This 15-foot tall, 10-foot wide chandelier is "created by a cylindrical array of abstracted lotus flower shapes made of laser-cut aluminum and illuminated with white light." The lotus is a symbol of enlightenment in Korean culture.

It sits out in front of The Vermont apartment complex, obscuring the parking structure.